

mommy and me moments

Filmmaker Monika Petrillo and her six-year-old daughter Louisa were part of an international effort to set a new worldwide flying record on March 8 to celebrate the Centennial of Licensed Women Pilots and Women's Day. Monika decided to use this opportunity to take her daughter up in the air for the first time. The 39-year-old mother of two from South Pasadena earned her own pilot's license at age 24, inspired her father to do the same, and together with him circumnavigated the continent of Australia in a single-engine airplane in 1998. She told the story of her adventure by making a feature-length documentary film called Flyabout, which will be shown at the South Pasadena Library on May 6 (flyaboutmovie.com).

Louisa brought her friend Lauren Galles and her mom. They were all very excited about this experience of flying in a small airplane over their own house, school and past the Hollywood sign. But they were probably most excited when Monika handed them their certificate and told them that they had just contributed to setting the "World Record of Most Women Introduced To Flying In A Single Day". When asked what was their favorite part about the flight, Lauren said, "The landing!" Louisa smiled and said, "The moment when the plane went up and then down. That felt a little bit like being in a roller coaster." Monika's favorite part, "Finally being able to share my dream of flying with my daughter." A true mommy and me adventure.
